

Becky Moriarty

Construction Management Graduate Student, Colorado State University, Fort Collins, CO

Becky is a second year graduate student in the Construction Management department, focusing her studies on Sustainable Building. Additionally, she works for the Institute for the Built Environment, an enterprise through the university that hires graduate students to help consult on green building projects. She also is interested in the dissemination of green building principles, especially to students. Aside from volunteering at various local schools, she is involved in a pilot project for the US Green Building Council, creating curriculum surrounding the concept of learning from green buildings.

Through her studies and exploration of the green building industry, she has taken a strong interest in urban design and transportation. In wanting to encourage her community to become green as a whole, she is researching the means and methods that are being implemented in other similar towns such as Fort Collins and campuses such as CSU. She is actively involved in the local community, working to influence campus and city planning towards layouts that inspire alternative transportation.
